The Hussman School of Journalism and Media offers programs leading to three graduate degrees:

- Master of arts in media and communication
- Master of arts in digital communication (online)
- Doctor of philosophy in media and communication

In all of the school’s graduate offerings, students are taught to examine critically the role of media in society and are provided with a firm grounding in theory and analysis. By setting high standards for both scholarly and professional achievement, the school seeks to prepare graduates to be leaders and critical thinkers, no matter what career paths they might take.

Financial Assistance
Roy H. Park Fellowships are available to select incoming doctoral students each year. Each fellowship provides an annual stipend of $20,500, payment of tuition and fees, $6,000 of research and travel support, and health insurance. Funding lasts for three years. Continuation of funding each year is dependent on satisfactory progress in the program. In return for this funding, each fellow must work as a graduate assistant for 15 hours each week. Assistantship assignments vary according to the needs of the faculty member and the interest and skill levels of the student. There is no special application process for this fellowship.

Each spring, continuing graduate students may apply for a number of scholarships and awards, including the William F. Clingman Award for the study of ethics; the Tom Wicker Scholarship for students pursuing reporting careers; the Joseph L. Morrison Award for Excellence in Journalism History; the Kathryn M. Cronin Scholarship for students intending to pursue a career in medical journalism, science communication, or health communication; and the Maxwell Graduate Scholarship in Medical Journalism. In addition, limited funds for thesis research are available through the Minnie S. and Eli A. Rubinstein Award.

Federal financial aid is available for graduate students enrolled a minimum of 4.5 hours per semester and who show financial need. The aid is typically limited to federal loans. Graduate/professional students apply for financial aid by completing the FAFSA.

Master of Arts in Media and Communication

The master’s in media and communication prepares students to be leaders and critical thinkers through training in skills, communication concepts, and research and analysis. With high standards for scholarly and professional achievement, the program serves individuals interested in entering media and communication professions, professional communicators who want more education in a specialized field, and individuals interested in communication research and teaching. Annual enrollment in the program totals about 45 students. The program consists of four areas of study: strategic communication, journalism, visual communication, and theory and research. A J.D.–M.A. dual-degree program, part of the theory and research area of study, also is offered in partnership with the UNC School of Law.

Requirements
All residential master’s students, regardless of area of study, must pass the school’s word usage and grammar test. This examination is a basic requirement for graduation for our undergraduate students and should pose no challenge for graduate students.

Each student must pass a comprehensive written examination covering the material in the student’s courses and an oral examination on the thesis or professional project given by the student's thesis committee.

Length of the Master’s Program
Most students complete the master’s in media and communication program in two years, typically attending classes full-time during three consecutive semesters and completing the thesis or thesis project in the fourth semester. Some students find it necessary to stay the summer after their second year to complete their theses or thesis projects.

Journalism Area of Study
The journalism area of study prepares students for careers in journalism with courses spanning multiple platforms and topic areas. Students learn about all facets of journalism, including research, analysis, writing, reporting, and editing. Because we believe that our professional master’s curricula should prepare students to be leaders in the 21st-century workplace, this area of study seeks a balance between critical thinking and technical communication skills.

Journalism master’s students complete 36 total credit hours, comprised of 11 courses over three semesters and a final thesis or thesis project.
in the fourth semester. At least nine courses must be taken within the school, and up to two courses may be taken from related subject fields in other schools and departments of the University or at neighboring universities. Each student is required to take four core courses (research literacy for media practitioners, media law, reporting/writing, and digital storytelling) and two required courses.

Strategic Communication Area of Study

The strategic communication area of study prepares students for advertising, marketing, communication, and public relations positions in agencies, corporations, nonprofit organizations, and government. Because we believe that our professional master’s curricula should prepare students to be leaders in the 21st-century workplace, this area of study seeks a balance between critical thinking and technical communication skills.

Strategic communication master’s students complete 36 total credit hours, comprised of 11 courses over three semesters and a final thesis or thesis project in the fourth semester. At least nine courses must be taken within the school, and up to two courses may be taken from related subject fields in other schools and departments of the University or at neighboring universities. Each student is required to take four core courses (research methods, media law, strategic writing, and digital storytelling). Other required courses include a campaigns course, market intelligence, public relations foundations, and a public relations seminar.

Visual Communication Area of Study

With specializations in interactive/graphic design and photo/video, visual communication master’s students learn to tell stories on a variety of visual platforms. Because we believe that our professional master’s curricula should prepare students to be leaders in the 21st-century workplace, this area of study seeks a balance between critical thinking and technical communication skills.

Visual communication master’s students complete 36 total credit hours, comprised of 11 courses over three semesters and a final thesis or thesis project in the fourth semester. At least nine courses must be taken within the school, and up to two courses may be taken from related subject fields in other schools and departments of the University or at neighboring universities. Each student is required to take three core courses (research literacy for media practitioners, media law, reporting/writing) and three courses in a selected area of specialization.

Theory and Research Area of Study

The theory and research area of study is designed for students who are interested in pursuing a doctoral degree or research positions in industry. The curriculum for students in this track is closely tied to the Ph.D. program curriculum. Students in this track do not take professional skills courses.

Within this 39-credit-hour degree program, each student completes a core set of classes and works with an advisor to build a specialized program of studies based on this foundation. Core courses include mass communication theory, research methods, and media law. Students also are required to take at least two courses in other schools and departments at the University or at neighboring universities. A research thesis also is required of each theory and research master’s student.

J.D.–M.A. Dual Degree

The J.D.–M.A. dual-degree program is designed for students interested in pursuing graduate studies in law and media and journalism and who plan to practice media or intellectual property law, pursue academic careers in law and mass communication fields, pursue doctoral study in a related field, or pursue careers in journalism or strategic communication with a law-related emphasis.

Admitted students typically complete the required first-year law school curriculum during the first year of study. The M.A. portion of the program requires 39 course credit hours and typically follows the theory and research program of study curriculum described above. In the dual-degree program, a student may count up to 12 credit hours of LAW courses toward the M.A. and up to 12 credit hours of MEJO courses toward the J.D. That accounts for the 24 course credit hours that are “shared.” That means that the dual degree requires a total of 101 unique course credit hours, and 27 of those course credit hours are MEJO course credit hours.

All degree requirements from both schools must be completed before the degrees are awarded, and dual-degree students must apply for concurrent graduation for both degrees the same semester. Students who do not maintain dual-degree status may need to take additional coursework if they pursue either degree separately after being admitted to the dual-degree program.

Master of Arts in Digital Communication (Online)

The master’s in digital communication empowers working professionals to advance their careers and bring immediate impact to their organizations. Students explore the economic drivers and technological changes affecting media and communication. Through a rigorous, project-based curriculum, students learn to find trends, patterns, and stories in data and communicate insights that will drive impactful decision-making. Students collaborate closely with faculty and peer professionals, learning to develop effective content creation and dissemination strategies across platforms, deliver unforgettable user experiences, and lead with strategic and entrepreneurial thinking.

Courses use an asynchronous course management system, which means that students are not required to gather online for class at specific times. The M.A.D.C. does feature one-hour synchronous sessions in some courses. These sessions are recorded for students to watch at another time if they are unable to attend in real time. M.A.D.C. students also are required to attend two on-campus residencies: a two-day orientation and a week-long summer residency between the first and the second year of the program.

The M.A.D.C. program admits one group of no more than 20 students each fall. Each entering class progresses through the program together over a 2.5 year period. Classes are intentionally small with an emphasis on interaction between faculty and students.

Requirements

The 30-credit-hour program consists of a set nine-course curriculum and a three-credit thesis project. These classes are taken in a prescribed order. Students who entered the program in 2020 take the following courses:

Students entering in 2021 and beyond will complete a revised curriculum, which will include the following new courses:

- Visual literacy and user experience
- Reputation management
- Leadership and entrepreneurship
- Media innovation in practice

Length of the M.A.D.C. Program

The M.A.D.C. program is designed to be completed in 2.5 years on a part-time schedule. During the first year, students enroll in two courses in the fall, two courses in the spring, and one course in the summer. In the second year, students enroll in two courses in the fall and two courses in the spring. In the third year, students enroll in a nontraditional thesis course in the fall.

Ph.D. in Media and Communication

The doctorate in media and communication prepares students to excel in college teaching and research positions or research careers in communication industries. Advancing the body of knowledge through theory building and testing, faculty work closely with each student to develop a program of study that is both interdisciplinary and tailored to meet the specific needs and interests of the student. The goal of the program is to produce outstanding scholars, effective educators, and highly skilled researchers.

The program is small and selective; no more than 7 to 10 students enter the program each year. Admissions decisions are based not only on the standard criteria described elsewhere in this catalog—GRE scores, grade averages, and letters of recommendation—but also on a determination of whether the applicant’s interests and goals fit with those of the program and faculty. For that reason, the statement of purpose and statement of research interests that must accompany an application are extremely important, and applicants are encouraged to be as specific as possible in outlining their research interests and career goals.

Requirements

The doctoral program is designed to be flexible and interdisciplinary, yet designed to ensure that students are equipped to conduct rigorous research and teach or practice in at least one substantive area. Full-time students take four courses each semester for their first two years in the program, for 48 credit hours (400-level and above courses) that combine the three core courses below and electives. In their third year, students enroll in six dissertation credit hours, to total 54 required credit hours, and also complete comprehensive exams.

The remaining required credit hours must be arrayed into three groups of courses: 1) a substantive area of study consisting of at least 15 hours of coursework; 2) research methods consisting of at least four courses; and 3) at least nine hours of coursework for the development of a secondary area of expertise or exploration of other substantive or methodological areas of the academy. Major and minor substantive areas should be selected from the list of approved substantive areas of study set by the program. The research methods that a student chooses to study must be appropriate to the student’s areas of specialization and dissertation topic. Students may take up to half of their course credit hours outside of the school.

Other requirements include:

- At least eight courses, totaling at least 24 credits, of 700-, 800-, and 900-level courses within the Hussman School of Journalism and Media
- At least four semesters in residence, with a minimum of two semesters in continuous study at UNC–Chapel Hill
- Satisfactory performance on written and oral comprehensive exams. Students must take both written and oral exams at the end of their Ph.D. coursework
- Successful completion and oral defense of a dissertation

Length of the Ph.D. Program

Most students complete the Ph.D. program in three to four years. Students typically complete four courses per semester over their first two years in the program. In the third year, they take comprehensive exams, defend their dissertation proposals, and complete their dissertations. Some students elect to stay a fourth year in order to compete more effectively for research-intensive positions at Research 1 universities or to pursue more ambitious dissertations.

The Graduate School requires students to complete the degree within eight years of first registration in the doctoral program. Reapplication is required to continue pursuing the degree if the eight-year time limit expires. In extenuating circumstances, a student in good academic standing may petition for an extension for a definite, stated period of time (up to one year).

J.D.–Ph.D. Dual-Degree Program

The J.D.–Ph.D. dual-degree program is designed for students interested in pursuing graduate studies in law and media and communication and who plan to practice media or intellectual property law, pursue academic careers in law and mass communication fields, or pursue a career in journalism or strategic communication with a law-related emphasis.

Admission to the UNC School of Law and the Ph.D. in media and communication program in the School of Media and Journalism must be gained independently in order to be admitted to the J.D.–Ph.D. dual-degree program in law and media and communication. Admitted students typically complete the required first-year law school curriculum during the first year of study.

Dual-degree students must complete the required 54 credit hours for the Ph.D. in media and communication, of which up to 12 credit hours may be drawn from approved courses in the J.D. curriculum. Dual-degree students also must complete the required 86 credit hours for the J.D. degree, of which up to 12 hours may be drawn from approved courses in the Ph.D. in media and communication curriculum in the School of Media and Journalism. This allows J.D.–Ph.D. students to complete the dual-degree program with 116 credit hours over approximately five years, depending on the individual student’s progress and program of study.

All degree requirements from both schools must be completed before the degrees are awarded, and dual-degree students must apply for concurrent graduation for both degrees the same semester. Students who do not maintain dual-degree status may need to take additional coursework if they pursue either degree separately after being admitted to the dual-degree program.
